I completed my Bachelor of Theology (2006), Bachelor of Theology and Development Honours (2007) and Master of Theology and Development (2010) at the University of KwaZulu-Natal. I then enrolled for Doctor of Theology (DTh) at the University of South Africa in 2011 and completed in 2014. My PhD is on Migration and vulnerable communities, particularly Unaccompanied Refugee Minors from Zimbabwe in South Africa. I also have an MA in Sociology (cum laude, 2017).

My research focus is on Practical Theology from below and vulnerable communities, particularly unaccompanied refugee children, and women and girls with disabilities. I challenge the interplay of African culture and religion in increasing the suffering of vulnerable communities. I have published extensively on practical theology and disability, practical theology and migration, practical theology and gender. My interest in collaborating in the 'Disability in Namibia Project' is for both activism and academic purposes to participate in the new emerging theological discourses and epistemologies on disabilities. I am currently working on a project titled: Disability, Stigma, and Resistance: A Feminist Practical Theology from Below, this project will theoretically and methodologically benefit from this collaboration.
